Introduction: Primary angiitis of the central nervous system (PACNS) is one of the less studied causes of ischemic stroke (IS) [1]. High-resolution dark-blood contrast-enhanced T1 weighted images have improved the diagnosis of large artery PACNS (internal carotid artery u2013 ICA, vertebral artery -VA) [2]. Objective. To study clinical presentation of ICA/VA PACNS. Material and methods. 30 patients (mean age 36.8u00b111.8 years, 22 men (73%) with ICA or/and VA PACNS verified by high-resolution dark-blood contrast-enhanced T1 weighted images (Fig. 1,2) were clinically studied. Results. ICA was affected in 23 patients (77%), VA - in 5 (17%), both - in 2 (6%). The arterial lesions were presented by prolonged artery stenosis (43%) (Fig.3), artery occlusion (40%), or their combination (17%). Clinical manifestation of ICA/VA PACNS in 28 patients (93%) was presented with IS which was combined with transient ischemic attack (TIA) in 17%. In 38% of patients stroke recurred in the period from 2 weeks to 2 years (average - 10 months). Diffuse headache shortly before or concurrently with IS was presented in 31% of patients. In 21% of patients IS was preceded by fatigue for several weeks/months. In the past medical history there were frequent (2-3 times a year) herpetic rashes on the lips or skin (44% patients), chickenpox in 20-28 years (7%), and psoriasis (7%). Conclusion. The presence of ICA/VA prolonged stenosis or occlusion in the young adults with ischemic stroke which is not connected with dissection, requires high-resolution dark-blood contrast-enhanced T1 weighted images to exclude PACNS. We then show how the value sets which accompany the EQ-5D can be applied to summarise patients' data.
